I went around to see Jean Monnet this morning at his brother-in-law's apartment. He has almost fully recovered. His doctors say he was simply exhausted by over-work. He has been in contact with Messrs. Spaak, René Loyer, Mollet and others in the last few days and thinks Spaak's technique of presenting the French Parliament with a demand for action on the existing EDC Treaty text before its summer recess is wise. He is to meet Spaak tomorrow in Luxembourg.

Little David was operated on for appendicitis at the American Hospital this morning and got through it well. I stopped to see him and found him groggy. E. remained at the hospital and I went to lunch with Eleanor Johnson for the opening of her now completed house at Vaux-sur-Seine. Having last visited it a day or two after she bought it, the contrast between its then dilapidated condition and its now resplendent state is ~~very~~ striking. She has done a remarkable job of restoration and decoration.

Tonight we went to the annual Travellers' Club ball. It was, as usual, well attended. The electricity failed for quite a time during the evening, but otherwise there were no mishaps of importance. We got home about 3:00 o'clock.
